MME JUNOT LAUGHED.-Mme. Junot, in her "Memoirs of Napoloon," relates many interesting and amusing anecdotes of the Emperor's youth. Ho was, as a lad, quick-tempered, sensitive and somewhat vain of his personal appearance, but possessed sufficient good indgment to control his temper upon occasion, and to give no evidence of injured vanity.

"I well recollect." writes Mue. Junot, "that on the day when he first put on his puriform he.

injured vanity.

"I well recollect," writes Mue. Junot, "that on the day when he first put on his uniform he was a system as young men usually are on such an orcasion. There was one part of his dress which had a very dull appearence—that was his book. They were so high and wide that his little slim legs seemed turied in their amolitude. Young people are always ready to observe snything ridimlous, and as so n as my lister and I saw Napoleon enter the drawing-toom we could not restrait our harther. At their early age, as well as in after live, he could not relish a joke, and when he found homes if the object of merriment he was certain to become anyry. My sister, who was some sayers older than I, said that since he wave as sword he ought to be galant to I dies and instead of being angry should be happy that they joked with him.

instead of being augry should be happy that they joked with him.

"You are nothing but a child—a little! pensionnaire! sait Napoleon, in a true of contempt.
"Coile, who was then 12 or 13 years of age, was highly indignant at being called a child and ane hastify resented the affect by raphying to I o peparte: And you are nothing but a puss in boots!

lo space: And you are noting as bosts!

"This excited a general laugh among all pro- nt except Napoleon, whose rige I will not attempt to describe. Though not much accustomed to society, he had too much tact not to perceive that he ought to be silent when personalities were introduced and his adversary was a child. Though deeply mortified at the unfortunate nickname which my sister had given him, yot he affected to forget it and to prove that he cherished no malice on the subject he had a little toy made and gave it to me. This toy consisted of acar in boots, and in the chartener of a footman running before a carriage. It was very well made, and must and in the charte er of a footman running before a carriage. It was very well made, and must have been rather expensive to him considering his straitened it cumstances.

"He brought slong with it a pretty little edition of the popular tale 'Puss in Boots,' which he presented to my sister, begging her to keep it as a token of his remembrance."
